Windy Weather Safety

We all know that wind cannot go through an object. So when you're out in windy weather, be aware of objects around you. Everything from bus shelters to skyscrapers. The real lessons about wind motion around objects are learned while you are out there in the wind.

Tailwinds, Headwinds and Crosswinds

Windy weather does not necessarily mean random wind patterns. Consistency in wind direction, speed and intensity can give one an edge in dealing with the effects.

If it is a tailwind, that is coming at you from behind, then you get a boost. It will assist you in your travel and is often not noticed, until you turn across, or into, its path.

On the other hand, a headwind can cause other problems. A headwind comes at you head-on. If it is strong and steady it makes your vehicle work harder. If you are towing a trailer of some kind, keep an eye on your temperature and fuel gauges. You can determine from them if and when the extra load from a strong headwind becomes too severe to continue.

Crosswinds are winds that cross your direction of travel from either side. Again, if they are steady then you can adjust by steering slightly into that direction. Here, though, is where you need to be on the lookout for objects that will block or redirect the crosswind.

Many things can change the way the wind crosses your path. Trees, small hills, buildings and other vehicles on the road can make a strong crosswind act differently on your vehicle. The crosswind can completely disappear. If you are not prepared you could steer yourself off the road or, worse, into an oncoming lane. Scan back and forth, using your mirrors and peripheral vision. Make a note of the objects beside the road that could block or redirect the crosswind. Consider the vehicles on the road in the same manner. An approaching truck will temporarily block any crosswind coming from the left as it passes you. Prepare by beginning to relax the tension you have on the wheel as the vehicle begins to pass you. That way you will not be drawn toward that lane by the apparent vacuum the vehicle creates. You will also be better prepared for the crosswind as the vehicle completes its pass. If your vehicle becomes too unstable because of changing wind pressures, find a place to pull completely off the road. Then what I do is check a local weather report, or use an online site for a local weather report to find out how long these conditions are expected to last.
