Sextortion is an abhorrent, prevalent blackmailing technique - and it's now even more intimidating. It's a simple practice, and increasingly widespread as our obsession with documenting ourselves develops.

What is Sextortion?

Sextortion is a form of blackmail in which attackers use sexually explicit images and videos stolen from their victims to scam them for money or further NSFW "Not Safe For Work" material. If the victims don't bow to their demands, whatever pictures or footage the criminals possess are released online. The attacks are getting more elaborate, and so are the threats. It can affect any age, but children are frequently the intended victims.

The traditional sextortion method is a simple one: scammers create fake social networking accounts, and engage strangers in conversations. These progress to video chats (Skype in many cases) and the attackers convince their victims to engage in cybersex—which is then recorded and used against them.

How has this changed?

Much of this remains the same, of course, but as well as enticing their victims into video chats, the criminals convince them to download a supposed-fix for an audio issue, which is in fact malware. Android is a particular target, but jailbroken iPhones are also vulnerable. The app or file then sends further personal data to the scammer, who goes on to list the names, phone numbers, and email addresses of family and friends, to directly threaten their close relationships. Nothing is private from the cybercriminals.

This evolution of sextortion is a change from blackmailing victims over explicit material to a more complete dominance over personal data and contacts. Here are some simple guidelines to keep in mind:

- Don't interact with strangers requesting a video conversation or cybersex;
- Don't download any apps or files from anyone you don't know;
- Delete any suspicious SMS or emails;
- Talk about what's happening. Even if it's embarrassing, family and friends like you for who you are, regardless of what mistakes are made; Remember, whether your webcam was hacked, you volunteered material, or if it was found on stolen equipment, it's not your fault.

Although no specific statute currently exists regarding sextortion in California, you can be charged with several different crimes including:

- Extortion (PC 518)
- Bribery (PC 67)
- Obscene Matter (PC311.2)
- Cyberstalking (PC 646.9)
