Teen Fads For Getting High

In the latest trend being used by teenagers, hand sanitizer apparently isn't just for sanitizing hands.

Case in point: Several California teenagers have recently been hospitalized with alcohol poisoning after drinking hand sanitizer.

The latest intoxication-inducing fad comes on the heels of other alternative methods kids are using to get high. Innocent Gummi Bears are soaked in alcohol, incense is smoked as marijuana, and cough syrup can be chugged to get high from its main ingredient, dextromethorphan, or DXM.

A typical bottle of the sanitizer is 60 to 70 percent ethyl alcohol, or 120 to 140 proof. By comparison, a bottle of vodka is usually about 80 proof.

What these methods have in common is that they may go unnoticed by parents who still consider roach clips and needles the only evidence of drug use. "It's all about perception," Marshall said. "If someone is carrying Gummi Bears, you wouldn't suspect anything."

Kids are going to continue to find ways to get high with products that people assume are normal. Parents wouldn't think the things in their children's backpacks are dangerous. They don't think about hand sanitizer. They don't think about a lot of things.

Officials in California said their recent cases are not a localized problem. We see it in the South, the Midwest, the East.

The practice also seems to have been around for a while. A YouTube search for "drinking hand sanitizer" produces dozens of videos showing kids chugging the stuff.

High school students have been filmed trying to get a buzz while in class. Younger parochial school students in their uniforms are shown at recess squirting the substance into their mouths. Some videos are dated as long ago as 2006.

We first heard about this a few years ago when the swine flu scare was going around, back then kids were licking their hands after using sanitizer to try and get high.

The bottom line is the matter of the kids' creativity. If there's another creative way they can come up with something, they'll try it. If it doesn't stick, they'll move onto something else.
