Teens and College Students: Prime Targets for Identity Theft

We spend a lot of time during our teenagers childhood years teaching them how to keep themselves safe. We remind them of the dangers of binge drinking and encourage them to lock their bicycles, their cars and their doors. The list of precautions goes on and on.

We issue so many warnings to our teens that we might not remember to educate them about protecting their very identities.

We sometimes think a student has little for a thief to steal — perhaps someone could make off with a laptop and a nice skateboard — but America's youth are prime targets for identity theft.

Many teens are not yet fully independent, and they often lack experience with financial matters. Those ages 18 to 24 are among the last to detect identity theft. It takes young adults an average of 132 days to notice important discrepancies that signal identity fraud, so their average loss is roughly five times more than the amount lost by other age groups.

Please encourage teenagers and young adults to take the following steps to fight identity theft:

- Update their computer and phone's operating systems. Keep anti-virus and spyware updated to prevent hackers from accessing devices remotely and password-protect your home screens to discourage prying eyes.
- If possible, have students leave their Social Security card, passport, birth certificate and bank and credit card statements at home. If they require these documents while at school, encourage them to store them securely — meaning lock them up. School mailboxes are not always secure.
- Students should never lend credit or debit cards to anyone, ever, even for a few minutes. Encourage your young adults not to use their account numbers to finance items like televisions or microwaves and to refuse roommates who want them to co-sign for loans. They can still contribute to purchases, of course, but if they do so directly they avoid the credit risk.
- Young people should read their mail. Remind your students to check credit or debit card statements closely for any suspicious activity. In general, the sooner they identify fraud, the less they lose. Also, teach your young adults not to just toss "junk mail" credit card offers and documents including financial information — shred them.
