Parents Multitasking While Driving

Lots of attention has been given to distracted teen drivers. However, parents are guilty of multitasking while driving just as teens, even though parents hope their children won't text and drive.

Parents can be guilty of the following technology-related multitasking distractions such as, talking on the phone, texting or changing a DVD or CD.

There are other types of multitasking that are also common: performing childcare duties while driving such as feeding their child, picking up a dropped toy, engaging in self-care grooming and eating.

Parents also drive while trying to find directions by using a map or a GPS device.

Texting is the least common distraction.

Another important factor is the type of safety restraints that parents use for their children, whether the safety restraint is appropriate for the children's age (for instance, whether they use a car seat for children under age 3, or seat belts for those ages 8 to 12).

Parents who do not use the appropriate types of safety restraints are more likely to drive while distracted than those who use the appropriate safety restraints for their children.

Parents should be cognizant of the aforementioned and realize that texting and cell phone use are not the only distractions a driver can face. Parents, please be safe while driving.
